for

If you work for a charity you probably spend most of your working life looking out for other – often vulnerable – people. But who is there to look out for you if you need it?

UNISON – the leading trade union for people working in the third sector – gives you the backup you need.

More charity employers sit down with UNISON to negotiate your terms and conditions than any other union – and we will represent your interests around the bargaining table.

And because we are the largest union in the sector, we have a strong voice to speak out on the things that matter to you most.

What does being in UNISON give you?

Our trained volunteer representatives are on hand to help. Through our trained and accredited reps, our helpline and our expert publications and website you can get the advice and support at work that you need.

We also have:

- an award-winning legal team (and we offer legal assistance to your family outside work – some T&Cs apply)
- thousands of health and safety advisors who keep you safe at work
- If making ends meet is tough we can offer debt advice and emergency financial assistance
- A dedicated UNISON helpline (0800 0 857 857) that is open until midnight and can signpost you to help
- Our own holiday centre on the beach in Devon, with discounts for members
- a range of member discounts (<https://benefits.unison.org.uk>)

We will work hard to improve your working life. Whether it's a better pay deal or issues like tackling violence at work, proper sleep-in pay or support when things go wrong, we will campaign with you to bring about change.

Our priorities are decided by our members in the charities sector, so don't you think it's time you joined up and joined in?
